P., Ved. tavīti and tauti, tūtāva, totum and tavitum, to have authority or power, to be strong; to attain; to thrive or increase, to fill, become full; to go or move; to injure, hurt, kill: Caus., Ved. (only used in aor. tūtot), to make strong or efficient, make valid, accomplish; [cf. Zend tav, 'to be able;' tavan, 'powerful:' Pers. توان tuvān, 'power;' توانم tuvānam, 'I can:' Gr. τύλος, τύλη, τυλόω, ταῦς: Lat. tumor, tumere, tumidus, tumultus (?), tuber, tueri, totus: Umbr. Osc. tauta, tota, touta, 'town;' tut-icus, 'townish:' Goth. thiuda, thiuth, thiuthyan: Angl. Sax. thū-ma, 'the thumb;' theod, 'people:' Old Germ. dū-mo, 'the thumb:' Slav. ty-ti, 'to grow fat;' tu-kŭ, 'fat:' Lith. tau-ka-i, 'fat;' tunk-u, 'I become fat:' Old Pruss. tau-ta, 'land, country:' Cambro-Brit. tyv-u, 'to increase.']

तु 3. tu, ind. (a particle, perhaps connected with the pronom. base 2. ta, or with the Vedic pronoun tva; never found at the beginning of a sentence or verse, and causing the verb with which it is constructed to retain its accent). As a particle implying 'earnest entreaty' or 'urgent request' it is often used in the Veda, like Lat. dum, with an imperative, and may be translated by 'pray!' 'I beg,' 'do' (e. g. ā tveta, come here, do); or it may be rendered by 'well,' 'now then,' 'now,' 'just.' As an adversative particle it is equivalent to 'but,' 'on the contrary,' 'on the other hand' (e. g. na ćhinatti janayatti tu, he does not destroy but he produces). The sense 'but' is most common in later Sanskṛit.

Tu is sometimes, however, used for ća, 'and' (e. g. ā samudrāt pūrvād ā samudrāt tu paśćimāt, to the eastern sea and to the western sea); and even for vā, 'or' (e. g. ushṭra-yānaṃ samāruhya khara-yānaṃ tu, having ascended a camel-carriage or one drawn by donkeys). Sometimes it appears to be incorrectly written for nu (e. g. kin tu for kin nu). Occasionally it seems to be used for tadā after ćet (e. g. tāṃ ćet na ditseyam pramathyainām kareyus tu, if I were not willing to give her then they would take her by force). Not unfrequently tu is used as an expletive to fill out a verse or prevent the blending of vowels (e. g. īrshyī ghṛiṇī tv a-santushṭaḥ, &c., an envious man, one over-compassionate, a discontented man, &c.). Tu—tu, although—yet; api-tu, moreover; kin tu, but, nevertheless, notwithstanding; paran tu, moreover, but, nevertheless; na tv eva tu, but by no means. According to lexicographers tu implies disjunction, mutual opposition, alternative, asseveration, emphasis, conjunction, &c.

Trita, as, m., Ved. (in the Atharva-veda also ṛita), N. of a Vedic deity; (he is generally associated with the Maruts, Vāyu, and Indra; and fights like the latter with Tvāshṭra, Vṛitra, and other demons: he is also called Āptya, q. v., either as produced in water by Agni, whence he is sometimes called 'a son of the water,' or as son of the Ṛishi Āpta. In some passages of the Taittirīya-Saṃhitā he is regarded as bestowing long life; while elsewhere he is supposed to reside in the remotest regions of the world, whence the idea of wishing to remove calamity to Trita or to the remotest place possible; cf. Ṛig-veda VIII. 47, 14. In some passages of the Veda, Indian commentators explain Trita by tri-sthāna, 'reaching through the triple world,' as an epithet of Indra or Vāyu. In later myths Trita is described as a Ṛishi, by whom several hymns of the Ṛig-veda were composed. Sāyaṇa in his introduction to Ṛig-veda I. 105, relates that there were three Ṛishis, named Ekata, Dvita, and Trita, who lived in a desert country; being parched with thirst, they looked about for a well, and having found one, Trita entered it to draw water, when the other two, desirous of obtaining his property, threw him into the well and closed up the mouth with a wheel; shut up in the well, Trita composed a hymn to the gods, and managed, in a marvellous manner, to perform the Soma sacrifice, that he might drink the Soma himself before death, or offer it to the deities in the hope of being extricated by them: his preparation of the Soma is described in the Mahā-bh. Śalya-parva 2095, and he is elsewhere celebrated as an offerer of the Soma. In various other epic legends, Ekata, Dvita, and Trita are described as three brothers, sons of Gautama or of Prajā-pati, = Brahmā. According to the Bhāgavata-Purāṇa, Trita is one of the twelve sons of Manu and Naḍvalā. Some identify the Vedic Trita with the Vedic Traitana, and with Thraetana the Zend form of Feridun. His connection with water points to a comparison with the Gr. Τρίτων, τριτο-γενής, Τριτωνίς, Τριτο-πάτορες, &c.) (Trita seems also to mean) a class of deities, 'the third ones,' i. e. those who live in the sky (?); the priest who prepares the Soma.

ध्वृण dhvraṇ, cl. 1. P. dhvraṇati, &c., to sound; (a various reading for dhraṇ.)

न 1. na, the twentieth consonant of the alphabet, and the fifth letter of the fourth or dental class, having much the sound of the English n in tenth. — Na-kāra, as, m. the letter or sound na.

न 2. na, ind. a particle of negation equivalent to 'not,' 'no,' 'nor,' 'neither' [cf. no, nanu, na-hi, na-tarām], and in the Veda a particle of comparison; it is used as a negative particle in wishing, requesting, and commanding (e. g. na mā garan nadyaḥ, let not the waters swallow me; nāvamanyeta kañćana, let him not despise any one), but not in prohibition before an imperative, and not before the aorist when it has lost its augment and stands for an imperative (in both which cases mā, q. v., is used). When joined with the potential, na may often have the sense of 'that not,' 'lest,' 'for fear lest' (e. g. na tvām śapet, lest he should curse thee). In argumentative writings na often comes at the end of a hypothetical argument in the sense 'not so' (e. g. nanu na kiñćin mānam iti ćen na, now if it be said that there is no proof, not so). Two nas are not unfrequently used in the same sentence to intensify an affirmation (e. g. na khalu na tat karishyāmi, I will most certainly do that; na tu jātu na, most assuredly), or any other negative particle may be joined with na with the same effect (e. g. nādaṇḍyo 'sti, he is not to go unpunished, i. e. he must certainly be punished). When a negation has to be repeated in successive clauses of a sentence or in successive sentences, na may be simply repeated or may be strengthened by one of the particles utu, ća, api, ćāpi, vā, athavā (e. g. nāham asyāraṇyasya devatā na ćāpy asya girēḥ, I am not the deity of this forest nor of this mountain), or the negative is not expressed in the second clause but represented by vā or api vā or ća standing alone (e. g. na hṛishyati glāyati vā, he neither rejoices nor desponds), or two clauses may have the negative particle and not a third (e. g. na deveshu na Yaksheshu mānusheshv api ćāṇyeshu tādṛig rūpavatī dṛishṭapūrvā, neither among gods nor Yakshas nor other mortals has so beautiful a female been before seen). Na is sometimes placed before round or collective numbers to denote a deficiency, the deficient number being prefixed in the inst. or abl. case (e. g. ekayā or ekena na vinśatiḥ, not twenty by one, i. e. nineteen; pañćabhir na ćatvāri śatāni, 395). When na is the negative of the simple idea expressed by a word, it may be regarded as compounded with it, and is then identical with 3. a, q. v. (e. g. na-vidvas, unwise; nādhīta, unread; na-kiñćana, q. v.) Na is often joined with other particles, e. g. na ća, na ćāpi, nāpi, nota, na vā, naiva, na ćaiva, nāpi ća, na tu, na tvevа, na tveva tu, na ćet (see ćed), na khalu, na ha (after this last a verb is said to retain its accent if used in the future with an imperative sense, Pāṇ. VIII. 1, 31). Na is frequently used in early Vedic composition as a particle of comparison = 'like,' 'as,' 'as it were' (e. g. tvā nāvam na dhīmahi, we meditate on thee like a boat; cf. 3. a, which also in a few instances = 'like'); it is also found in this sense in the later artificial poems; [cf. Lat. ne, non; Gr. νη in νη-κερδής, νη-κηδής; Lith. ne; Slav. ne; Goth. ni, ne, nei; Angl. Sax. na; Old Germ. ni; Hib. ni.]

नु 1. nu, ind. (perhaps related to 1. nava; cf. nūtana), written nū in Ved. at the beginning of a verse and frequently in other places. (As an adverb of time in Ved.), now, still (e. g. nū-ća purā-ća, both now and heretofore; anī scīn nu vīryaṃ tat te, hast thou still that power?). (As an inferential particle in Ved. often beginning the last sentence of a hymn), now therefore, now then, therefore, then (e. g. nū no rāsva, do thou therefore give us): (as an introductory particle, or in encouraging, invoking, inviting, summoning), now, then, pray, come then (e. g. abhi nu mā ćakshamīthāḥ, pray now [Sāy. quickly] have compassion upon me). Nu is often employed in questions, both in Vedic and classical Sanskṛit, to strengthen an interrogative pronoun or adverb (e. g. kadā nu, when indeed? katham nu, how indeed? kva nu, where indeed? kaṃ nu pṛićchāmi, whom can I possibly ask? kiṃ nu syāt, what can that possibly be? kiṃ nu khalu, why in the world?). Nu is also used interrogatively in classical Sanskṛit, without an interrogative pronoun, in sentences of two or more clauses (e. g. svapno nu māyā nu mati-bhramo nu, was it a dream? or an illusion of magic? or a mental delusion?). Nu also serves as a particle of affirmation, to express 'indeed,' 'certainly,' 'surely' (e. g. ahaṃ nv akārsham, Yes, I certainly did so), and often gives emphasis to the word it follows without being itself translateable, in which way it is frequently connected in the Veda with other particles (e. g. with ćit in ćin nu; with id in in nu; with adha in adha nu; with gha in ghā nu, &c.); but in the Veda nu sometimes means 'never' (especially in the construction nū ćit = never, nevermore; in other passages it is said to = 'from this time forward,' 'for ever'). In classical Sanskṛit nu is sometimes found in connection with vā, 'or;' and in Rāmāyaṇa II. 72, 27, nu—nu may be translated 'either'—'or.' According to native commentators on the Veda nu often = kshipram, quickly. According to native lexicographers nu is used in the following senses: pṛićchā, vikalpa, vitarka, anunaya, atīta, apamāna, hetu, apadeśa; [cf. nū-nam, nū-tana; Zend nū, 'just now;' Gr. νύ, νῦ-νί, νῦν; Lat. num, nun-c; Goth. nu-h; Old Germ. nu; Slav. nyne, 'at present.']
